The National Assembly is a bicameral legislature that serves as the highest lawmaking body in Nigeria. It consists of the Senate and the House of Representatives, with both chambers having equal legislative powers. The National Assembly is responsible for making laws, amending the constitution, approving budgets, and overseeing the executive branch of government.

Structure and Composition

The Senate has 109 members, with each state represented by three senators. The House of Representatives has 360 members, with each federal constituency represented by one member. Senators are elected for a term of four years, while members of the House of Representatives are elected for a term of two years.

The leadership of the National Assembly consists of the Senate President, who presides over the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who presides over the House of Representatives. The Senate President and the Speaker are elected by their respective chambers from among their members.

Functions and Powers

The National Assembly has a wide range of functions and powers, including:

- Making laws
- Amending the constitution
- Approving budgets
- Overseeing the executive branch of government
