In the 18th century, Russian classical music began to develop. The first Russian opera, "The Sorcerer," was written by Vasily Pashkevich in 1782. The following century saw the emergence of some of Russia's most famous composers, including Mikhail Glinka, Alexander Borodin, and Pyotr Ilyich Tchaikovsky. These composers were influenced by both Western and Russian musical traditions, and their work helped to establish Russian classical music as a major force in the world.

In the 20th century, Russian music continued to evolve. The Soviet Union saw the rise of socialist realism, a style of music that was used to promote the communist ideology. However, many composers also experimented with new and innovative styles, including atonality and serialism. After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, Russian music became more diverse than ever before. Today, there are a wide range of musical styles being produced in Russia, from classical music to rock and pop.
