In a world where people with disabilities are often invisible, Ten Days in Mad House is a groundbreaking project that shines a light on the challenges they face in healthcare settings. Through powerful photography and personal narratives, Mint Editions has created a platform for people to share their experiences and advocate for change.

The Project

Ten Days in Mad House is a collaboration between Mint Editions, a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting artists with disabilities, and the National Disability Rights Network (NDRN). The project was conceived by photographer and Mint Editions founder, Barbara Dumetz, who was inspired by her own experiences with the healthcare system as a person with a disability.

For ten days, Dumetz and a team of photographers and writers visited hospitals, clinics, and other healthcare facilities across the country. They interviewed people with disabilities about their experiences, and photographed them in the places where they receive care.

The Impact

The Ten Days in Mad House project has had a profound impact on the disability community. The photographs and narratives have been featured in exhibitions, publications, and online platforms, reaching a wide audience of people who may not have otherwise been aware of the challenges faced by people with disabilities in healthcare settings.

The project has also helped to raise awareness of the importance of disability rights. The narratives of the people featured in the project highlight the need for accessible healthcare, respectful treatment, and informed decision-making for people with disabilities.

The Legacy

Ten Days in Mad House is a powerful and lasting legacy. The project has helped to raise awareness of the challenges faced by people with disabilities in healthcare settings, and has inspired advocates to work for change.

The project has also provided tangible support to organizations working to improve healthcare for people with disabilities. Mint Editions has donated a portion of the proceeds from the project to NDRN, which is using the funds to support its work on disability health and safety.

Ten Days in Mad House is a groundbreaking project that has made a significant contribution to the disability rights movement. The project has raised awareness of the challenges faced by people with disabilities in healthcare settings, and has inspired advocates to work for change. The project's legacy will continue to inspire and inform for years to come.

Call to Action

You can support the Ten Days in Mad House project by:

- Visiting the project website and sharing the stories and photographs with your friends and family.
- Making a donation to Mint Editions or NDRN.
- Contacting your elected officials and advocating for policies that support disability rights.

Together, we can make a difference for people with disabilities in healthcare settings.
