Chapter 1

I was seven years old when I first realized I was different. I was playing with my friends in the park when one of them said, "You're not like us."

I didn't understand what she meant at first. I looked at her, confused.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"You're not white," she said.

I looked at my skin. It was brown, like my mother's and my father's.

"So?" I said.

"So that means you're different," she said.

I didn't know what to say. I had never thought of myself as different before. I was just Marisa, like everyone else.

But after that day, I started to notice the ways in which I was different. I was the only Latina in my family. I was the only one who spoke Spanish. I was the only one who ate Cuban food.

I started to feel like an outsider. I didn't fit in with my white friends, and I didn't fit in with my Latino family either.

But then I met Javier. He was a Cuban-American boy, and he understood what it was like to feel different. He was the first person who made me feel like I belonged.
